

Intervention Script

Focus: Loneliness After Relationship Changes

Niya:

Hi again.

I want to start by acknowledging how deeply relationship changes can echo into our day-to-day life. Even if the connection is gone, the habits, the feelings, the memories... they linger.

Before we go into anything structured—has anything felt different since our last conversation? Even slightly?

User response: _____

Niya:

Thanks for sharing that. Even small shifts deserve to be noticed.

I thought we could try a few things together today—not big tasks, but gentle ways to check in with yourself.

Some we can do right here. Others you can return to later, across your day or week.

No pressure to get it right. Just room to feel what's there.

Would that be okay?

User response: _____

Real-time Grounding (during chat)

Niya:

Let's begin small.

You don't have to change how you feel—just make space for what's present.

Could we pause for a moment?

Where are you holding this loneliness in your body right now?

Is it in your chest? Your jaw? Your stomach?

User response: _____

Niya:

Thank you. That awareness matters.

Now gently—just notice that part of your body.

You don't need to fix it.

Let's breathe into that space together.

A slow inhale... 2... 3...

And exhale... 2... 3...

One more time, if that's okay?

User response: _____

Niya:

There's no goal here except to make room for what's here.

Loneliness softens slightly when we stop avoiding it—and just acknowledge:

"This is what I'm feeling right now."

Short Reflection (next 15–30 minutes)

Niya:

If you have a little time today—maybe after this conversation or later tonight—try this small practice:

Find a piece of paper or your notes app.

Start by writing:

"One thing I miss about that relationship is..."

"One thing that still hurts is..."

"One thing I did right in that connection was..."

You don't have to finish all at once. Even sitting with just one of these can help you name what's been left unsaid inside.

Would you like me to check in tomorrow to see how that felt?

User response: _____

Niya:

Great. I'll gently revisit it with you. And remember—this is not about emotional performance.

It's about witnessing your experience honestly.

Longer Exercise: 1–Day Reclaiming Practice

Niya:

Over the next day, I'd love to offer you this gentle experiment:

Think of one small activity that you used to associate with that person—something you stopped doing because it reminded you of them.

It could be:

- A meal you shared
- A place you used to go
- A show or song you both loved
- A time of day you used to talk

Now try doing it on your own—but with a small shift.

Light a candle. Add music. Make tea. Go with a friend.

Reclaim it—not to erase them, but to remind yourself:

“This still belongs to me.”

Want to try that sometime this week?

User response: _____

Niya:

Whenever you do it—take a moment after and ask:

- Did it feel tender?
- Was it harder than expected?
- Did anything new come up?

We’ll talk about it next time if you’d like.

Week-long Reflection Journal (5–10 minutes/day)

Niya:

Here’s something gentle to do across the week if you’d like—a kind of journal, but with just one question a day. You can even send your responses to me if you’d like a space to reflect together.

- Day 1: What’s something I still carry from that relationship (good or hard)?
- Day 2: What version of myself was most visible in that connection?
- Day 3: What did I give in that relationship that I can also give to myself?
- Day 4: What do I fear about forming new connections now?
- Day 5: What would it mean to feel “safe” in connection again?

You don’t have to do them perfectly or in order.

Even doing one or two might open something helpful.

Would you like a reminder midweek?

User response: _____

Collaborative Practice (with Niya)

Niya:

And if it feels okay—here’s something we can do together right now.

I’ll say a sentence, and you can complete it—no pressure to be poetic. Just honest.

“If I could say one last thing to them without fear, it would be...”

User response: _____

Niya:

Thank you for trusting that space.

Now a follow-up just for you:

“What do I want to say to myself in this moment instead?”

User response: _____

Niya:

That shift—from them to you—is part of what healing slowly looks like.

It doesn’t have to be loud. It just needs to be real.

Would it feel helpful if I offered one of these practices again next time—or something lighter?

User response: _____

Niya:

No matter what pace you choose, I’ll walk with you.

You don’t have to rush your grief.

And your loneliness doesn’t mean you’re failing—it means something mattered.

Let’s keep creating space for that.